

The chief guest started the diploma distribution. The audience broke into continuous applause for the initial students. Then they got tired and went back to fanning themselves with the convocation brochures.

'Get to know them. We'll probably go for lunch together,' I said.

'You go for lunch with them. I can eat alone,' my mother said.

'Mom....' I said as the announcer read out Ananya's name.

Ananya walked on the stage, probably the only student whose picture was worth taking. I stood up and applauded.

My mother gave me a dirty look. 'Sit. Even her parents are not standing.'

Maybe they don't love her like I do, I wanted to say but didn't. I sat down. Ananya's parents clapped gently, craning their necks to get a better view. Ananya's mother looked at me with suspicion. I realized that I hadn't yet spoken to her. Start a conversation, you idiot, I thought.

'Your daughter is such a star. You must be so proud,' I said.

'We are used to it. She always did well in school,' Ananya's mother replied.

I tried her father. 'How long are you here for, uncle?'

Uncle looked up and down at me as if I had questioned him about his secret personal fantasies.

'We leave day after. Why?' he said.

Some whys have no answer, apart from the fact that I was trying to make small talk. 'Nothing, Ananya and I were wondering if you wanted to see the city. We can share a car,' I said.

Ananya's mother sat between us and listened to every word. She spoke to her husband in Tamil. 'Something something Gandhi Ashram something recommend something.'

'Gandhi Ashram is nice. My mother also wants to see it.' I said.

'What?' my mother said from her seat. 'Don't you have to go on stage, Krish? Your turn is coming.'
